- Can be mentored by colleagues with experience of the media industry
- Are able to see how the skills and workflows they've learned on the course fit into real world practices.

Length

15 or more days

Location

Various locations. The work experience must take place within an established workplace, studio or office where the professional creation of media content is a primary goal.

Professional Accreditation or Recognition Associated with the Course

Professional Body

Broadcast Journalism Training Council (BJTC)

Professional Publisher's Association (PPA)

Accreditation/ Recognition Summary

The BJTC is the largest journalism training accreditation body in the UK, recognised by the BBC, ITN, Reuters, Associated Press, Channel 4, the National Union of Journalists and others. BJTC accredited courses enjoy enhanced industry contact, access to prestigious awards and guaranteed work experience placements. Students on a BJTC accredited course follow a rigorous programme that includes industry simulated newsdays, work experience in the media industries, study of media law and local governance and hands, practical and vocational training. The BJTC require students to study and pass both H4 Introduction to Media Law and H5 Media Law in Context to progress to the next level of the course.

The PPA represents over 250 publishing brands in the UK. Courses with PPA membership have access to networking events, forums and working groups that help to support the progression of their courses and the prospects of their students.

Course Overview

Aims

BA (Hons) Journalism at Leeds Beckett University helps students develop a comprehensive understanding of traditional and contemporary journalism practice. Students also develop the academic skills and critical awareness associated with degree level study.

The programme enables students to develop as critically active and reflexive individuals through practical and professional tasks.

The course has four strands that run vertically through the programme; key techniques, theory, practice and journalism skills. Horizontally, each level represents a different stage in student learning; foundation or "boot camp", consolidation and independence. These stages also incorporate appropriate extra-curricular delivery; core skills at level 4, presentation skills at level 5 and employability at level 6.

Our dedicated newsroom has PC computers with EditShare connectivity to the TV studio and Adobe Premiere for video editing. The newsroom also has iNews for TV bulletin scripting and Burli for radio.

The current course is aware of journalism's rich history, but it is future-focused. With full-time jobs in traditional media in decline, but work in online, digital and freelance markets expanding, we deliver traditional training alongside mobile, online and social media production skills.

Our journalism graduates may have the core competencies, but they also have the multi-media production skills and entrepreneurial spirit that make them desirable employees and potential employers in the marketplace.

What's more, they will emerge with a strong sense of what makes journalism, journalism. They will learn how to critically challenge and rationalise the attacks that journalism faces from social media sub-cultures and established institutions. In short, they will learn to create real journalism, not fake news.

As a course team we have worked to bring greater creativity, cohesion and focus to an already successful course. As a multiplatform degree, the course reflects the dynamic and changing nature of contemporary journalism and it is highly responsive to that change.

Course Learning Outcomes

At the end of the course, students will be able to:

1	Have undertaken an intellectually challenging study of the practice and principles of contemporary journalism, including fairness, accuracy and key ethical, regulatory and legal concerns.
2	Be prepared for a career in the dynamic and challenging world of journalism across multiple platforms of news gathering, dissemination and production, to tight deadlines.
3	Undertaken an intellectually challenging and stimulating study of journalism and its methods, contexts and concepts from a theoretical perspective.
4	Have produced real journalism from the start, on a course that ensures they are introduced to a range of core skills that they will have the opportunity to improve. These will include the ability to use primary and secondary sources correctly, digital literacy, presentation skills, problems solving, story spotting and an awareness of news values.
5	Have developed the ability to work on more than one project at a time and to manage those projects effectively whether in groups or as individuals.
6	Have been encouraged students to apply critical thinking and reflection to their own practice as aspiring journalists and to their own learning and personal development.

Teaching and Learning Activities

Summary

The course incorporates a variety of learning and teaching strategies that put the student at the centre of the experience. They are encouraged to learn in action, applying critical thinking and evaluation to practical and academic.

BA (Hons) Journalism has been developed to incorporate self-managed learning and prepare students for complex, dynamic, globally-relevant news communication environments. It is a powerful approach dealing with problem solving in a realistic way, empowering students with skills that will help them in industry.

The design of BA (Hons) Journalism integrates learning vertically and horizontally – with themes feeding across modules and forwards to future learning. We emphasise to students that modules are part of a whole course and that learning is holistic. There is a clear progression of learning outcomes through all three levels can be clearly traced in our level outcomes and module specifications.

Students will be encouraged to value the contributions of their peers, for example during tutorial discussions and student presentations to the group.

BAH Journalism is a community of people as well as a course. We support this in several ways. We have our public facing website Leeds Hacks, which also has a social media presence. We keep in touch with students through social media pages too.

A newsletter is published each semester where we highlight student activities and try to build cohesion across the course.

In addition, induction at all levels prepares students for a new level of study. At level 4, students are set a writing task that not only works as an icebreaker, but also allows tutors to assess writing skills and identify areas where students need support. At levels 5 and 6, emphasis at induction will be on consolidation of skills both academic and practical, and the development of a professional portfolio.
