What you will study

Course aims
The course intends to develop and provide the following learning aims:

To provide an effective, coherent, and intellectually challenging postgraduate education in construction law and dispute resolution.

To enhance students' abilities in the identification and evaluation of appropriate decision-making strategies.

To develop research capability and cognitive skills which enable students to analyse problems in their professional context.

Teaching and learning activities

The Construction Law and Dispute Resolution programme is delivered entirely through web-based distance learning, designed to meet the needs of busy professionals working across the construction, engineering, and legal sectors. Teaching and learning take place in a virtual learning environment that provides pre-recorded lectures, reading materials, and reflective self-assessment exercises. Each module is also supported by live online tutorials to facilitate interaction and discussion. Typically, there are six online tutorials for each 20-credit module and four for each 10-credit module, scheduled between 17:00 and 19:00 (UK time) and recorded to maximise accessibility for students unable to attend live sessions.

In this course, students explore the complex legal and contractual environment of the construction industry and gain the knowledge and practical expertise to confidently avoid, manage, present, resolve, and determine disputes, providing a strong platform for career advancement and professional success.
The Law of Obligations and Construction Law Principles modules develop students' understanding of tortious and contractual rights, duties, and liabilities relevant to the industry - providing an essential foundation for the rest of the course. While these modules are taught primarily from an English law perspective, the analytical and reasoning skills acquired are transferable across jurisdictions.

The course introduces the main methods of dispute resolution, with particular focus on adjudication and arbitration. Students study the legal and procedural frameworks that govern these processes, including the key legislation and institutional rules that shape their operation. Building on this foundation, the Adjudication Decision Writing and Arbitration Award Writing modules equip students with the skills to assess party submissions and draft clear, reasoned, and enforceable decisions.

Throughout the course, students develop the ability to analyse evidence, think critically, and present well-reasoned legal arguments. These skills are consolidated in the Law and Practice of Claims module, where students produce a detailed claim document in response to a simulated dispute scenario.

Finally, the Dissertation allows students to apply their learning to a relevant topic of professional interest by completing an independent research project guided by an academic supervisor. Whether analysing a current legal development, evaluating a practical dispute management challenge, or investigating an emerging area of industry practice, this module enables students to showcase their expertise, critical thinking, and professional insight - building skills that will set them apart in their careers.
